The Centre's stand that the move is aimed at securing national security is weak given that in most cases related to terrorism the problem is not a lack of data, but a failure to act on information authorities already had. The assurances that the provision to 3 into citizens' computers will be processed only under stipulated laws also do not give much comfort in the light of the revelations made by Edward Snowden that showed how agencies in the US were using provisions of the Patriot Act to secretly collect information on millions of Americans.

To be fair, one cannot fault the current NDA government alone for giving sweeping powers to law enforcement agencies when it comes to snooping on citizens. Previous governments under the UPA had also gone down the same path. For example in 2012, Canadian phone maker Blackberry was forced to set up a local server in India to enable law enforcement agencies to snoop into Blackberry Messenger. In 2013, a mass 4 programme called the Central Monitoring System was launched. This allowed security agencies and even income tax officials to tap directly into e-mails and phone calls.

The authorities justify snooping into users' conversations and data interaction on the grounds of getting better information on potential terror attacks. The latest move is only an extension of this mindset. But the intelligence agencies need to show proof that the snooping programme in the past has actually thwarted a terrorist attack. (On the other hand there is ___5___ opportunity to misuse such sweeping powers for keeping political adversaries in check by muzzling freedom of speech and undermining privacy rights.
